In the three decades since Deng Xiaoping declared that China's economic development would necessarily involve some people becoming rich before others, regional inequalities have risen steadily. This seminar will reflect on recent trends in China's regional industrial development in order to consider the likelihood that policymakers will achieve their policy goal of “diminishing considerably” the regional inequalities between the Western and other regions by the middle of the 21st century.

Jane Golley joined the China Economy Program in the Crawford School in 2008, after spending five years in the School of Economics. She has published a book on Chinese regional development and articles on Chinese industrial agglomeration and regional policy; Chinese demographic change, economic growth and the real exchange rate; Chinese household energy consumption and emissions, and cross-country comparisons of trade openness and growth.